

Problem Statement

It can be difficult for someone with roommates to tell the status of their roommates without physically being with them or having to bother them.

Who:

Students at university, young professionals with multiple roommates, and friend groups encounter this problem.

What:

It can be difficult to tell what your friends and roommates are doing, especially when you are in physically different spaces. How can you tell if someone wants to hang out, needs to study, or needs to be left alone if you are unable to reach them? This can lead to conflicts over room space, friends feeling left out, or someone not getting the support that they need. Friend groups need a way to effectively and quickly communicate what they are doing and what level/type of interaction they would like.

Where:

This problem arises in apartments, dorms, and any other kind of shared living space.

Why:

It can be cumbersome to check what all your roommates are doing if you need someone or want to hang out without bothering them.